THE THEATER.

Columbia Theater. It is an austere and uncompromising stage creation that claims attention at the Columbia Theater this week. To the stu-dent of the earlier periods of English history and literature its value is very great. To the casual seeker for diversion "Everyman" is likely to prove a chilling surprise. Under different auspices the play might have exerted a strong religious influence, but the legend "Charles Frohman presents" relieves the severity of the occasion by an applied assurance that, serious as the morality play may have been in its day, it is now offered only as a literary and historic curiosity, with excellent artistry, the sanction of scholarship and a saving share of business judgment back of its exploitation. So strong is the religious purport of the play that its existence in the haunts of modern amusement needs all the apology that art and scholarship can supply. Its moving and intense scenes last night translated a large audience of good-natured and fairly comfortable twentieth century took small account of human life and hanged one another for theft. After seeing "Everyman" and accepting it as a fair example of the drama prior to Eliza-beth's era, it is small wonder that one so much attached to the joys and graces of the world seriously contemplated suppress-ing the theater in favor of bear-baiting. They were men of strong wills and overwhelming moods in these days, and if they were to be moved it must be by plain speech. At the present time when read-ing and writing are common accomplish-ments the bluntness of these pictures of the struggles between death and his victim must be a shock. Possibly the shock is wholesome; but on the other hand stands the possibility of an appeal to morbid in-

"Everyman" considered as a literary composition is a work of wonderful symmetry and beauty. It is a close and complete allegory. This form of composition requires an accurate grasp of widely separated ideas and a harmonizing of them that must be as clean and perfect as that achieved by the musician who constructs a fugue. The allegory has been practically abandoned, for lack, evidently, of the ability amongst recent writers to perpetuate it. The inter-est with which "Everyman" was received in its own day and the fascination which it now wields leave no doubt of the popular affection for truths thus vivified. The completeness and certainty with which the equations of thought are worked out to accurate conclusions betoken an intelligence developed up to the capability of consider-ing ideal impressions with the same sureness of method that numbers enable us to apply to concrete things. "Everyman" has all the force of poetry without the artifice. The simple series of pictures illustrating the call of death, the desertion of good fellowship and kindred, the futility of riches, the treachery of Strength, Beauty, Discre-tion and Five-Wits, despite their loyal protests; all these constitute a tragedy the more terribly impressive because of the unompromising crudeness with which it is

The performance of Miss Matthison, who plays "Everyman," is most remarkable and admirable. The work which she undertakes s extraordinary and the manner in which she fulfills the task irreproachable.

New National Theater.

A most cordial and receptive audience greeted Miss Julia Marlowe and her company of players at the National Theater last evening. It was her first appearance here in a year, and the greeting extended her attested both to her talents as an actress and the popularity of her offering, 'When Knighthood Was in Flower."

Miss Marlowe's natural and acquired gifts and personality of uncommon charm are still shown to excellent advantage in the role of Mary Tudor. Her voice is musical and is attuned to the most wooing modulations. The historical features of the play themselves are intensely interesting, dealing as they do with a profligate age and people of historic note. But the love of Mary Tudor for Charles Brandon affords Miss Marlowe ample opportunity for all the delightful caprices, moods and phases of lover's life. In the role of Mary Tudor Miss Marlowe has opportunity commensurate with her powers, strongly aided by the ample range of a womanly character.
Mr. Tyrone Power, as Charles Brandon, was an unmistakable favorite from the be ginning. He brings to the role a dignified affection, coupled with tenderness of feeling and manly strength. Mr. Power has been playing "Ulysses" in Stephen Phillips' poetic drama. He fits the role of Charles Brandon, and shows a marked magnetic personality.

The remainder of the cast is very well balanced, Mr. Fred Tyler making a most acceptable Henry VIII. The play is newly dressed, and a shifting of the characters since the company last appeared here shows to no disadvantage.

The play will be produced tonight and tomorrow night and Wednesday matinee. "Ingomar" will be presented for the remainder of the week.

Chase's Theater.

The interest of the large audience at Chase's Theater last evening centered in the appearance of Miss Vesta Tilley of London music hall fame, whose large salary as a vaudeville performer in this country has been so extensively advertised. Miss Tilley was given a rousing ovation when she first stepped upon the stage last night, which indicated the auditors' friendly attitude and that they had been keyed up to high expectations and were willing to have them realized. The applause accorded to the performer's work was almost as hearty as the ovation at the beginning. Miss Tilley sings well and cleverly and dances with considerable grace. In addition to this she wears men's clothes with a naturalness and taste scarcely excelled by even the most fastidious of the male sex. The most pleasing of her songs and im-The most pleasing of her songs and impersonations were "Algy, the Piccadilly Johnnie," "The Seaside Sultan," "Following in Father's Footsteps" and "In the Pale Moonlight." Miss Tilley has a wonderful faculty of sinking her own personality into that of each character she assumes.

Nora Bayes scored a hit in several amusing German dialect songs. A fine musical turn was contributed by the Five Nosses, who played both classic and popular selections on a variety of instruments. The Venetian setting for this act formed a suitable and highly picturesque environment. Jack Norworth touched off a number of rapid-fire jokes and sang topical songs cleverly. The program closes with a series of vitagraph picgram closes with a series of vitagraph pic-tures, including scenes in the life of the American cowboy. ## Academy.

The old saying that the merits of a person or anything else cannot be properly judged by a name is forcibly presented in the entertainment provided for the Academy patrons this week. The name, "At the Old Cross Roads," is suggestive of something good and clean, with a moral such as rural comedy drama of home life in the country might present. The story concerns the marriage of a wealthy land owner to an octoroon, and their daughter, who is kept in ignorance of her true condition in life until her hand is asked for in marriage by a neighbor's son. Then follows the terrible secret, which not only startles her friends assembled at a house party, but triends assembled at a house party, but those in front of the footlights as well. The story is perhaps too plainly told. It is not of the kind that ought to appeal to the theater going public. Estha Williams, as the octoroon, was unusually capable, as was also James M. Brophy, as a steamboat gambler. Louise Vallentine sang and danced herself into popularity in her character of a colored male juvenile. The American Four Quartet, contributes a series of young performances.

Funmaking is not the whole object of the performance, however, as numerous good specialties, catchy songs and excellent dancing are introduced.
